Persuasion and Persuading in the migration policy discourse

Migration policies are discussed on many levels, and with many intentions. Political choices are often portrayed as 'black and white', favouring simple solutions to complexity. An informed conversation about migration regimes and their generosity towards migrants is thus obscured. Judicial arguments - and academic expertise in the field of migration (law) more broadly - is perceived neither as persuasive nor pertinent. Rather, arguments such as the closing of borders or flowery language such as 'efforts to tackle root causes' feature high in conventional wisdom. More detailed, controversial questions are raised before courts. Judging in this field of law is therefore marked by a high degree of political salience and remains an intricate task, arguably burdening heavily the national judiciary. The Netzwerk Migrationsrechts' annual conference 2019 lends itself to the question whether and in what ways academia may engage actively with the public and thus cater to the discourse on migration. Financial support has been requested by the Federal Government's Child and Youth Plan through the Working Group of Catholic-Social Educational Institutes as well as the Stiftung Integrationskultur.
